Woman at a Window

Swinging from the handles of the pushchair a polythene bag stretched with tins – swinging from the handles, cutting at her shins as she pulls the buggy up the concrete stair case. Armpits of her blouse dark with sweat. The bulb in the stairwell burns a cold yellow light.
The steps smell of urine.

At the window, her back to the kitchen, her son watching television, she looks out at the square,
a cherry tree dense with blossom.
She looks hard into it: the clusters of petals get thicker, softer.
She wonders, if she fell,
would those branches catch her.
