Dressed to kill in Small Town, Utah

Salute to Kim Addonizio

I’m putting on that little black dress.
Walk down Main Street every hairline wrinkle showing in my cleavage endless like time.
That little dress sleeveless backless tight like armor. Oh, how the ruffles flirt and veil my weathered knees! And yes every strand of hair shaved to a stump a showstopper for sure just look at the green wave from north Main to south no one no crossing can stop me. Blank greeting cards sigh and wave from the Hallmark shop window the ones never sent to me and I don’t care.

By the sports goods store prime bicycles sparkle in a chorus line front wheels turn to follow my little black march and I’ll keep walking even if this is my last stretch under stealthy looks shot from idle eyes hooded in family vans eyes my spike heels might just gouge out eyes starved for steamy sidewalk dreams modest shorts aching to drop behind the butcher shop where I order tongue and tenderloin.
And how that blue-eyed butcher longs to wrap me in crackling sheets of paper hairs standing to attention on his beefy forearm.

I might just die and be buried in this little black dress.

And the band will play on and we will all paddle to this other world across a sizzlin’ Styx of haute coffee. Black.
No cream. No suga’.
