Rosann Kozlowski

Saints in Stained Glass

His hands bless the same woman since the sixteenth century.
For hundreds of lives I look at the hue. Today the azure fashions my arm into linden leaves. When the sun strikes, my chest bears a kaleidoscope.

I’m all color and prompt.

One breast holds sovereign, the other snow; my heart is a study in intaglio, fire grips my knees; my ribs raise winter’s indigo. If I breathe, the seasons flare to the rafters.

I’m fired and dazzling:
what have I done with my life?