Jeffrey Arnett

God's Breath

I stand on the same bridge and breathe in the fog you called, God's breath, your epitaph falling into the ocean far below.

If you listen between heartbeats you can hear the suicides falling, always facing the shore.
Splashing more softly than you expect,
most sinking so quickly you barely notice.

When you jumped did you look to the bright lights of the city or close your eyes?

The fog lisps over the sea and it could be God’s breath and this is the very bridge, brother, where you let go your last handhold.

From here, I can barely see the shore and the silence drowns your voice.
If we were deaf only our hands could speak of love.