Nuclear Power advocates are touting the importance of nuclear power as a solution to global climate change by saying that nuclear power is carbon free. If people believe this we could be looking at another generation of nuclear power and nuclear waste. But, there is no place for the nuclear waste we have now! Yucca Mountain continues to be at the forefront of this issue. The nuclear industry knows that it needs a solution to the waste before much progress can continue to build new nuclear plants, so they the pressure is still very much on the Yucca Mountain Project to go forward. Furthermore, since the current legal limit on the amount of waste to go to Yucca Mountain (77,000 tons) will be insufficient for the existing generation of nuclear reactors there is pressure to expand the capacity of Yucca Mountain . Despite what some politicians have been saying this issue remains hot, and the public must remain vigilant.

This year the Department of Energy hopes to submit a license to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission (NRC) to begin to build the repository. Those commissioners with the NRC need to hear from the people. The public needs to be involved. In the meantime the Department of Energy will be holding hearings on another Environmental Impact Analysis for Yucca Mountain , and this is an open process. We also need to press the presidential candidates to, if elected, direct the Department of Energy to respect the Treaty of Ruby Valley, abide by the science and data they already have, and abandon Yucca Mountain as the nation's highly radioactive waste dump.

Bonnie Raitt is a founding member of MUSE, Musician's United for Safe Energy and has been an anti nuclear and renewable energy activist for some thirty years.
